Italian architect Rocco Valentini has recently completed the historic renovation of a late 19th century masonry home and mill. the two existing structures served different purposes, one used for agricultural processing and refinement while the other served as the owner's villa- two structures separated on the property but working closely together. In order to restore new function into the decaying architecture, the designer physically connected each building with a contemporary injection of corten and glass, creating a new entry foyer and vertical circulation core. The angles and materials of the intervention relate to those used in agricultural processing machinery.
